.. Die Blendung. A Novel 2, which sold more than 3.5 million copies in the German speaking world. The author expressed himself in his native language (carnatic and Latin). He was an avid reader of Rudolf Steiner's anthroposophic ideas, as well as the work of Henri Bergson and other French philosophers. He had read a number of works by Nietzsche, and his own thoughts on the subject had been pre-figured in Die blaue Blume (1898). In a 1924 lecture he voiced the opinion that "wonder at all is still the most characteristic reaction of the human being to a world that, however, he cannot grasp, and he is the only being that does so." Some critics have suggested that his second, pessimistic novel is a retelling of ... Die Blendung. A Novel 1. Success While Die Blendung was originally written in the latter half of 1930, it was not published until 1933. The novel was immensely popular with the German reading public, and it was read across Europe and America. ... Die Blendung. A Novel 2... published in English in 1967 and read for the first time in New York was also widely praised. Some critics feel that the novel is a thinly veiled autobiography of the author, as the book is dominated by the theme of dementia. The novel is a sort of philosophy of 'degeneration' in the sense that it describes a loss of reason and 'reasonableness' in a culture of murder, violence, and destruction, a culture that saw itself as "the New" but was in fact the very incarnation of the 'Old'. In this context, the novel presents a supposed moral lesson for the 'New' generation, that of the death of a victimless war, of a new spirit of tolerance, peace, and international understanding. The "terrifying" aspects of the novel are not confined to the feigned insanity of the protagonist, but can also be found in the story, in a society based on a cult of crime, and in the moral breakdown of the characters themselves. The author's beliefs about the right to life, and the role of the artist in modern society are presented in the work. The novel is also an exploration of the life of one person, the attempt to know the personality of another, which is offered as a moral message, that to the degree that we are acquainted with each other, a social contract 82157476af
